

American Troops on Fighting Line in France

An impressive and inspiring moment for some of our fighting men on the Picardy front. A regiment of infantry, before going into action, is receiving the regimental flag, which is saluted by officers and men.

French official photo.

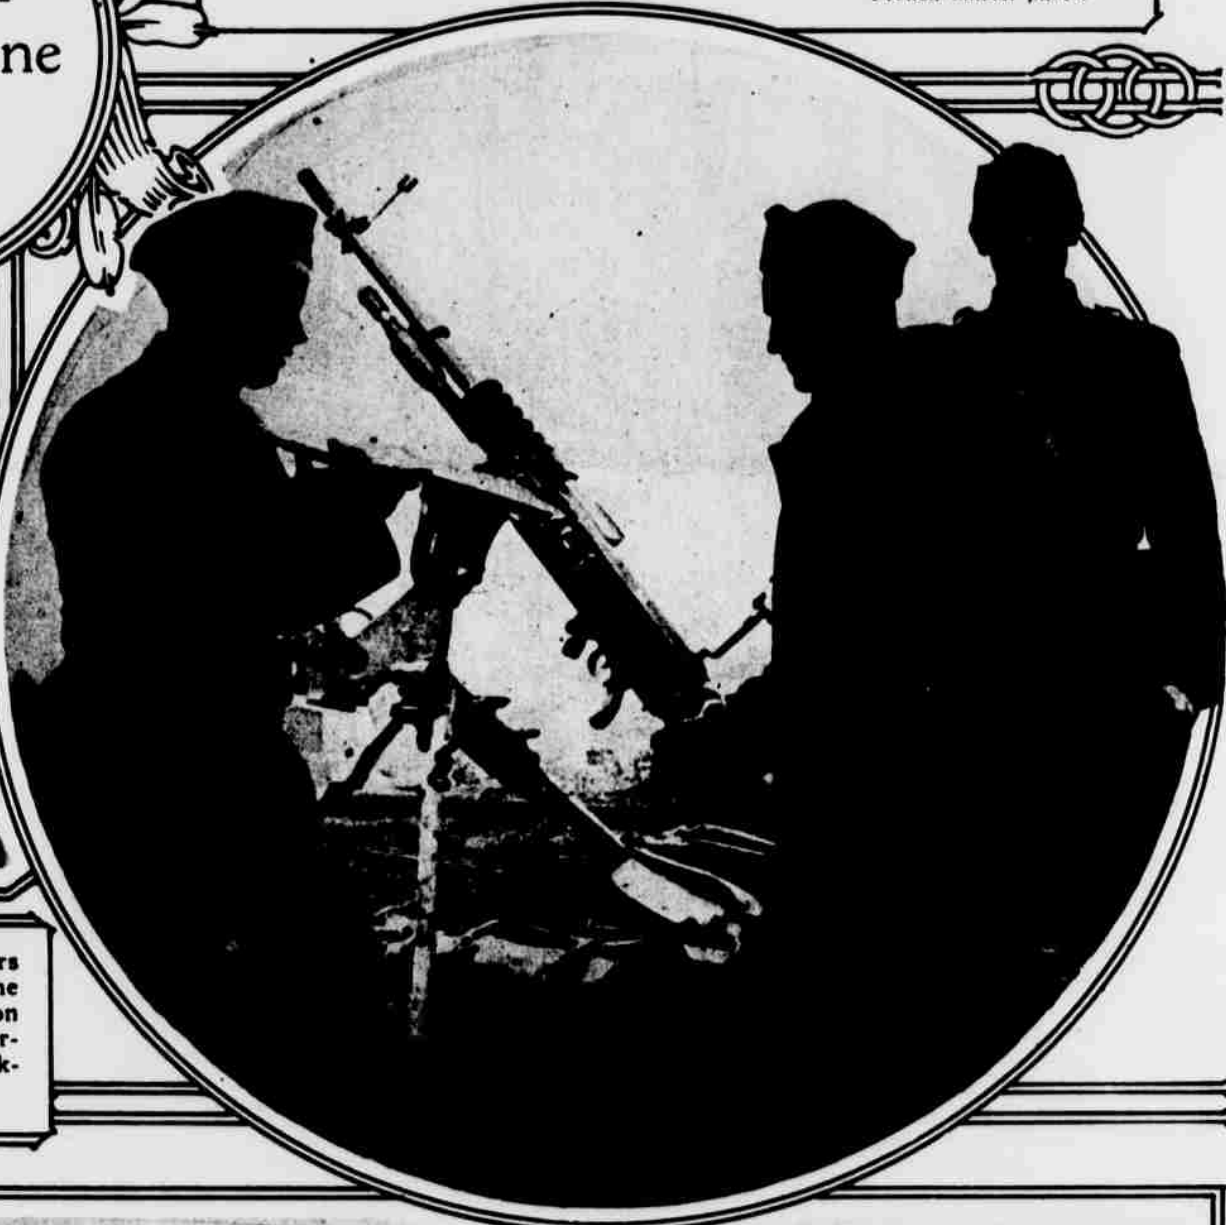

American soldiers who are acting as military police in Paris drawn up for review. Together with the American air squadron these men do invaluable service in preserving order and safety in the French capital.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

In circle—American soldiers putting an anti-aircraft machine gun in position in a village on the Flanders front which German fliers are continually attacking.

French official photo.

The commander of a regiment of French mounted chasseurs reviews his men as they ride past to take their places in the great battle. A flare of the trumpets salutes the column of intrepid horsemen.

French official photo.

Some of the American soldiers already on the Picardy front standing at "port arms" during a drill before entering the fighting. Our men are making their presence felt. Their recent capture of Cantigny shows the stuff of which they are made.

French official photo.